

Mullowny in Blue Gives Prisoners Indigo Day

Police Court Judge Sends a Cripple Down for Second Offense—Louisa Bronson Gets Chance to Learn to Like Jail

"Oyez! Oyez! Oyez!" from the court cried heralded the entry of Judge Mullowny this morning and the little group of prisoners in the corner cage began to sit up and take notice.

Jags were again the order of the day. "Thirty days and $5 fine," came often from the bench.

The judge was wearing his blue suit this morning and it always means a blue day for folks that come his way. Mr. Kendig, the genial bailiff, cordially invited one after another to say whether he was guilty or not guilty and so the busy day went on.

John Lee, a cripple, helped the court's conscience to rest easy after being most troublesome for some days. Lee was sentenced to thirty days by Judge Mullowny not long ago for vagrancy. He promised to leave town, but his reappearance before Judge Mullowny proved he had not kept his word.

"It Hurt Me."

"Do you know," said the judge, "it hurt me very, very much to send you down. You are a cripple and it has worried me continually ever since. I'm glad now that my judgment has been vindicated. No, no more chances," said the court when Lee pleaded for one more, "you've broken your word and you can have thirty days more."

When Louisa Bronson, a young colored woman, tripped blithely to the dock to answer the charge of vagrancy, she was greeted by a group of her acquaintances lined up ready to tell Judge Mullowny all about it. They said many uncomplimentary things about Louisa and tore some of the solid portions of her character into fringe. Louisa didn't like the way things were going for her and strenuously denied them. The court was shocked.

An Unwelcome Chance.

"Do you hear the things they say about you?" the judge asked Louisa. "Yassir," she answered, "but it taint so, suh."

"How did you like it at the workhouse when you were there before?" the court inquired.

"Didn't like it at all," Louisa pouted. "Well, have thirty days again," suggested Judge Mullowny, "maybe you'll like it better this time."

Just as Louisa started off on her little journey to Uncle Sam's busy little shop out on the commons, up walked Lawrence Jones and Mary Johnson. Too much Scotch whisky, said Mr. Jones and Miss Johnson very merry last night, but there was no trace of revelry on their faces this morning. Jones proved to Judge Mullowny that he had never been before him, but Mary was an old stager. She drummed cheerily on the dock railing, and made no protest when the court fined her $5 and Jones $2.

Mr. Harzer, the clerk of the court, poured over his papers and called the case of Rosie Williams and William Browly. When the defendants and their witnesses went up to the railing they suggested a fire sale of turban hats. Rosie and two of her women friends wore jaunty turban hats precisely alike in shape and topped off with daisy like cockades. It was manifest that the light which brought them all to court had not been through jealousy of each other's hats. A fine of $5 was imposed on each.

Cheap at Any Price.

A vicious looking eye confronted Judge Mullowny this morning when William P. King lurched up to the dock. There was no mistaking the fact that King had had a beautiful time, but even the eloquence of his highly colored eye was not sufficient to plead his cause, and the court decided it was a cheap jag even at $5, and King got busy looking for the coin.

Judge Mullowny's blue suit got in its work, but every time it did the judge looked sorry. It was Friday anyhow.

PAYS HUSBAND ALIMONY TO KEEP AWAY FROM HER

Court Agrees to New York Woman's Bargain—Club Ready if He Comes Around.

NEW YORK, Nov. 24.—Mrs. Kate Mueller, who runs a restaurant at 324 Broadway, Valentine Mueller, to the Lee avenue police court, where she charged him with being an habitual drunkard.

Mueller denied that he had annoyed the woman and declared that he had simply demanded his rights. His wife had all the money and he had none, he said.

Mrs. Mueller admitted that she had money and expressed a willingness to support her husband if he would remain away from the restaurant. Mueller agreed and Magistrate Higginbotham directed the woman to pay the husband $4 a week.

As the couple left the courtroom Mrs. Mueller handed her husband the first payment and gave him $1 extra. "Take my advice and don't come near me," she said. "If you do I've got a knife and a club for you."
